butyl ('bju:tɪl). Chem. [f. BUT-YRIC (f. L. butyrum butter) + -YL. So called from its relation to butyric acid, q.v.]

1. The monatomic alcohol radical of the tetracarbon series, C_4H_9, called by its discoverer Corbet Valyl, and by later chemists also Tetryl, and Quartyl.

(There are four isomeric modifications of TETRYL, $CH_3CH_2CH_2CH_2$, $(CH_3)_2.CHCH_2$, $C_2H_5.CH.CH_3$, $(CH_3)_3.C$, of which the second or Isobutyl is the butyl of Wurtz, 'a colourless oily liquid, having a faint but agreeable odour, and a slight taste with burning after-taste' (Watts).

1868-77 WATTS Dict. Chem. (1879) V. 731 Tetryl or butyl. Ibid. VI. 373 With sodium it gives off.. but little butyl. 1870 TYNDALL Heat XV. §750 It is called nitrite of butyl.

Chem.* (1874) 330 Butyl hydride.. is the lightest of all known liquids. Ibid. 331 This [normal butyl alcohol] is the primary alcohol, as it yields on oxidation butyl aldehyde and butyric acid. 1869-71 WATTS Dict. Chem. (1879) VI. 373 Isopropyl-carbinol or isoprimary-butylic Alcohol constitutes the butylic alcohol of Wurtz, which was extracted from fusel-oil. For a long time it was the only butyl alcohol known to chemists. 1873 FOWNES Chem. 599 Butyl-carbinol is prepared from normal butyl alcohol in the same manner as the latter from normal propyl alcohol. 1880 Med. Temp. Jrnl. July 167 He found that butyl and propyl alcohols were possessed of strong toxic properties. 1940 Economist 20 July 100/1 The Standard Oil Company of New Jersey has evolved an entirely new product, which it calls 'butyl'. 1940 R. by (baɪ), prep., adv. [OE. bí (biʒ) accented; bĭ, be unaccented, = OFris., OS., MDu., bî, be, (Du. bij, be-), OHG. bî, bi, bĭ- (MHG. bî, be-, Ger. bei, be-), Goth. bi, bi- 'about, by':—OTeut. bi*, prob. cognate with L. am-bi- prefix, Gr. ἀμφί, prep. and prefix 'about'. (For the disappearance of am- in Teut., cf. OTeut. bo-, with L. am-bo-, Gr. ἀμ-φο- both.) Originally an adverbial particle of place; when prefixed to a verb it generally coalesced with the latter, and was treated as a prefix; when construed with substantives (in the dative or accusative, according as the relation was that of being near, or moving near to), it became, like other adverbs, a preposition. Cf. the series: 'þæt folc bí stód (bi-stód)', 'þæt folc him bí stod (him bi-stód)', 'þæt folc stód him bí,' 'the folk stood by him', and the mod.English, 'to stand by, stand by him, be a bystander'.

The single form bi of OTeut. was subsequently, under the influence of the stress, differentiated into the strong or accented bî, bī (by, bij, bei), and the weak or stressless bĭ, later bĕ. The strong form was used for the adverb, the accented prefix of nouns, and a stressed preposition; the weak form for the stressless prefix of verbs, and a stressless preposition. The influence of levelling, however, tended at length to make bî (by, etc.) the separate form in all cases, and to leave be- as the weak prefix; thus, while in OE. the prep. was both be and bi, in ME. it was usually written bi, by, and modern Eng. makes the preposition, like the adverb, by, in all positions and senses, and has be- only as a stressless prefix. The same is true of mod.Ger. bei, be-, and Du. bij, be-. But in pronunciation there was a weak and a strong form in ME. (cf. forms like be-sides, be-times, bum troth, bum Lady, byrlady), as is still usual in the dialects. In modern Sc. bĕ is the ordinary form of the preposition unaccented, or in a weakened sense, as in 'sit be the fire', 'written be a clerk', 'ane be ane', by the form of the adverb and strong preposition, as in 'stand by', 'to pass by a place be the railway'. This use of be as preposition has been uniform in the northern dialect since the earliest preserved ME. specimens.]

A. prep. Forms: 1–2 be, 1–5 bi, 1 bí (biʒ), 3– by, (4 bie, 5 bye, north. 3– be). (Formerly often placed after the governed word, which may still be done in verse).

2. a. In forms of swearing or adjuration.

Here bi is the original prep. in Teutonic (Goth., OHG., OS.), and must have had a local sense, 'in presence of', or perhaps 'in touch of' some sacred object: in ON. where bi was entirely lost, at appears, and must have been local. But in OE. literature the prep. was ordinarily purh, perhaps after L. per; though be occurs in one place in the Rushw. Gloss. and may represent native usage. It is thus not certain how far the ME. use of by was native, or how far it was a translation of F. par, of instrumentality. To modern apprehension there is apparently no notion of place, but one approaching that of instrumentality or medium. See SWEAR. Cf. BEFORE 6.

by- in composition.

A. A ME. variant spelling of the prefix BI-, BE-, under which see most of the words, as, under BE-, bycause, bydene, bydryve, byfall, byfore, byget, bygynne, bygile, etc.; under BI-, byreusy, byweve, etc. Those words only are given under BY- for which no forms with be- or bi- have been met with.

B. by- (sometimes bye-): the preposition, adverb, or adjective BY in combination, either in words already formed in OE. with the accented form of the prefix, bí-, big-, or in words of later formation, especially those in which by has an attributive sense, and cannot be separated by any clear line from BY adj., since the use of the hyphen is very uncertain. All the principal words so formed are treated as main words in their alphabetical places; the less important and more obvious combinations here follow, under the various uses and senses of the prefix.

I. 1. Compounds in which by- is a prep., as by-rote a. See also by-hither, by-south (BY prep. 9 c), by-ordinary, by-common, etc. (BY prep. 7), and BYHAND.

A kind of cap or head-dress (peaked before and behind): a. as a military head-dress, a casque; b. as an ornamental cap or head-dress, worn by men and women.

(The two crowns [? of England and France] with which the bycoket of Henry VI was 'garnished' or 'embroidered', were, of course, no part of the ordinary bycoket.)

¶ Through a remarkable series of blunders and ignorant reproductions of error, this word appears in modern dictionaries as ABACOT. In Hall's Chron. a bicocket appears to have been misprinted abococket, which was copied by Grafton, altered by Holinshed to abococke, and finally 'improved' by Abraham Fleming to abacot (perhaps through an intermediate abacoc); hence it was again copied by Baker, inserted in his Glossarium by Spelman, and thence copied by Phillips, and so handed down through Bailey, Ash, Todd, etc., to 19th century dictionaries (some of which provide a picture of the 'abacot'), and even inserted in dictionaries of English and foreign languages.

1548 HALL Chron. Edw. IV an. 2 One of them had on his hed the said Kyng Henrie's helmet (some say his high cap of estate), called abococked [ed. 1550 abococket], garnished with two riche Crownes. 1568 GRAFTON Chron. II. 661 His high Cap of estate, called Abococket. 1577 HOLINSHED Chron. 1314 His highe cappe of estate, called abococke. 1587 Ibid. (ed. by-law, bye-law ('baɪlɔ:). Also 4 bilage, 4–6 bilawe, 6–7 by-lawe. [In sense 1 apparently (from the identity of meaning, and the identification of bylaw-man (see below) with byrlaw-man) a doublet of BYRLAW. The difference of form would be explained by the derivation of bylaw from the stem instead of the genitive case of ON. býr, Sw. and Da. by, 'dwelling-place, farm, village, township, town': cf. the Dan. bylag, Sw. byalag, bylag, mentioned below. It is less probable that bylaw might be formed in England itself from the same elements: cf. BY sb.^{1}; but it might be a corruption of byr-law either phonetic, or due to confusion with the adverbial prefix BY-. The earliest examples of the word refer to Kent: the difficulty of assigning a Scandinavian etymology to the local name of a Kentish custom is obvious, but cf. quot. 1292 under BYRLAW from an assize held in Devonshire, and quot. 1370 for the general use of bylaw in sense 2. Sense 3 however shows that the word was in the 16th c. used as if f. BY adv. + LAW, analogous to by-name, by-path, by-way; and this is the way in which sense 2 is now understood and used. This may have been, in its origin, merely a mistaken interpretation, but it is also possible that a word may have been formed independently from these elements, without influence of the Scandinavian word, although naturally falling together with it in the general sense of subsidiary or side-law.

The compounds actually found in the Scandinavian langs. are Da. bylag, explained by Molbech as 'Forening imellem alle eller endeel Bönder i en Landsby, Bymenighed', i.e. 'association between all or some of the farmers in a rural township, bymenighed', the latter being further said to be 'the community of citizens in a town, of farmers in a rural township, etc.'; also Sw. byalag, bylag, village community. In ON. lag had, among other senses, that of 'fellowship'; the pl. lög those of 'law', 'law-community or association', and 'law-district' (cf. the Dena-lagu or Dane-law). The sing. has given Sw. and Dan. lag-et; the pl. Sw. lag-en, Da. lov-en 'law'. The word belagines, alleged by Jordanis to be Gothic for 'written law', has sometimes been referred to in this connexion; but it can have no relation to the Eng. word.]

† 1. Apparently the same as BYRLAW: occurring in the 13th c. as the name of a custom (in Kent) according to which disputes concerning boundaries were settled outside the law courts, on the testimony of neighbours, by official or specially deputed arbitrators. Obs.

Thorn Chronica (Twysden p. 1936) [Abbas Nicholaus ordinavit] Item si contingat quæstionem moveri inter nos [monks of St. Augustine, Canterbury] & archiepiscopum vel ejus tenentes de subtractionibus, purpresturis, dampnis seu aliis injuriis hinc inde factis, quod consuetudo illa quæ dicitur bilage observetur. 1303 ibid. Ad sextum articulum petitur, quid intelligitur per hanc dictionem Bilage. b. Often specially applied to ordinances made by common assent in a Court-leet or Court-baron. Cf. BYLAW-MAN.

1607 COWELL Interpr., Bilawes [ed. 16 adds ' or rather By-laws, that is Laws made obiter or by the By'] are orders made in court leets or court Barons by common assent, for the good of those that make them, farder then the publique law doth binde. These in Scotland are called (burlawe) or (birlawe) Skene de Verb. Sign. verbo Burlawe. 1622 CALLIS *Stat. c. In Old Danish, bylag had also the sense 'Payment or contribution in order to receive citizenship or the freedom of the by' (see Kalkar); the following quotation applies the name to a proportional charge or assessment made for a local purpose: cf. 1642 in b.

1691 BLOUNT Law Dict. s.v. Bi-scot, 9 Edw. 3, At a Session of Sewers held at Wigenhale in Norfolk, it was decreed, That if any one in those parts of Marchland, should not repair his proportion of the Banks, Ditches and Causeys, by a day assigned, xiid. for every Perch unrepaired (which is called a Bilaw) should be levied upon him.

2. A 'law' or ordinance dealing with matters of local or internal regulation, made by a local authority, or by the members of a corporation or association. More particularly: An ordinance made by the members of a corporation for the better government of their own body, or for the regulation of their dealings with the public; in modern times most commonly (as by railway companies) in the exercise of powers expressly conferred by the Legislature.

1. The local custom or 'law' of a township, manor, or rural district, whereby disputes as to boundaries, trespass of cattle, etc., were settled without going into the law courts; a law or custom established in such a district by common consent of all who held land therein, and having binding force within its limits. Hence byrlaw-court and BYRLAW-MAN, -GRAYVE, q.v.

These laws regulated such matters as the dates of ploughing, the turning out of cattle, the number of cattle turned out by each tenant of common land, the fines for trespass and damage done to fences, etc., the keeping up of fences, sea banks, the pound, the 'balks' in fields, and the like.

2. transf. A district having its own byrlaw court, or local law.

In the form Bierlow this word is common as an appendage to place-names in Yorkshire: Brampton Bierlow, Ecclesall Bierlow, Brightside Bierlow. These are the names of somewhat extensive parishes; it is to be presumed that the various hamlets forming each were originally connected by their resort to a district court of justice.

C

C (si:), the third letter of the Roman alphabet, was originally identical with the Greek Gamma, Γ, and Semitic Gimel, whence it derived its form through the successive types Γ, ☾, C. The Greek Kappa, K, being from the first little used by the Romans, C functioned in earlier Latin both as (g) and (k); the latter sound being the more frequent came to be viewed as the more appropriate to C, and about 300–230 B.C., a modified character, Ꮆ or Ꮆ, was introduced for the (g) sound, and C itself retained for the (k) sound. Hence, in the classical period and after, G was treated as the phonetic representative of Gamma, and C as the equivalent of Kappa, in the transliteration of Greek words into Roman spelling, as in ΚΑΔΜΟΣ, ΚΥΡΟΣ, ΦΩΚΙΣ, in Roman letters CADMVS, CYRVS, PHOCIS.

When the Roman alphabet was introduced into Britain, C had only the sound (k); and this value of the letter has been retained by all the insular Celts: in Welsh, Irish, Gaelic, C, c, is still only = (k). The Old English or 'Anglo-Saxon' writing was learned from the Celts, apparently of Ireland; hence C, c, in Old English, was also originally = (k): the words kin, break, broken, thick, seek, were in OE. written cyn, brecan, brocen, picc, séoc. But during the course of the OE. period, the k-sound before e and i became palatalized, and had by the 10th c. advanced nearly or quite to the sound of (tʃ), though still written c, as in cir(i)ce, wrecc(e)a. On the continent, meanwhile, a similar phonetic change had also been going on. Original Latin C (= k) before e, i, had by palatalization advanced in Italy to the sound of (tʃ), and in France still further to that of (ts). Yet for these new sounds the old character C, c, was still retained before e and i, the letter thus acquiring two distinct values. Moreover the sound (k) also occurred in French before e and i (chiefly as a representative of Latin qu); this was now expressed in Northern French by the Greek letter K, k; so that the sound (k) had two symbols, k and c, while the symbol c had two sounds (k and ts). These French inconsistencies as to C and K were, after the Norman Conquest, applied to the writing of English, which caused a considerable re-spelling of the Old English words. Thus while OE. candel, clif, corn, crop, cú, remained unchanged, Cent, cæȝ (céȝ), cyng, brece, séoce, were now (without any change of sound) spelt Kent, keȝ, kyng, breke, seoke; even cniht was subsequently spelt kniht, knight, and pic, picc, became thik, thikk, thick. The OE. cw- was also at length (very unnecessarily) displaced by the Fr. qw, qu, so that the OE. cwén, cwic, became ME. qwen, quen, qwik, quik, now queen, quick. The sound (tʃ) to which OE. palatalized c had advanced, also occurred in French, chiefly (in Central French) from Latin c before a. In French it was represented by ch, as in champ, cher:—L. camp-um, cār-um; and this spelling was now introduced into English: the Hatton Gospels, written about 1160, have in Matt. i-iii, child, chyld, riche, mychel, for the cild, rice, mycel, of the OE. version whence they were copied: this was, phonetically, an improvement. In these cases, the OE. c gave place to k, qu, ch; but, on the other hand, c in its new value of (ts) came in largely in Fr. words like processiun, emperice, grace, and was also substituted for ts in a few OE. words, as miltse, bletsien, in early ME. milce, blecien. By the end of the 13th c. both in France and England, this sound (ts) was reduced to simple (s); and from that date c before e, i, y, has been, phonetically, a duplicate or subsidiary letter to s; used either for 'etymological' reasons, as in lance, cent, or (in defiance of etymology) to avoid the ambiguity due to the 'etymological' use of s for (z), as in ace, mice, once, pence, defence.

Thus, on the plea of showing the etymology, we write advise, devise, instead of advize, devize, which obliges us to write advice, device, dice, ice, mice, twice, etc., in defiance of the etymology; bad example has extended this to hence, pence, defence, etc., where there is no plea whatever for c. Former generations also wrote sence for sense.

Hence, in modern English, C has (1) the 'hard' sound (k) before a, o, u, before a consonant (except h), and when final, as in cab, cot, cut, claw, crow, acme, cycle, sac, tic, epic; (2) before e, i, y, it has the 'soft' sound (s). In all words from Old English or Old French, final c is avoided: the (k) sound being written k or ck, as in beak, meek, oak, book, bark, balk, bank, pack, peck, pick, rock. This is probably due to the claims of derivatives like meeker, oaken, barking, rocky, where c could not be used. Final c however is written in modern words from Latin, Greek, or other languages, and (of late) in the ending -ic, as in sac, tic, epic, critic, music, picnic. In the rare cases in which this c is followed in inflexion by e or i, it is necessary to change it to ck, as in physicking, mimicking, frolicking, trafficker, picnicker. When the (s) sound is final, it must be written -ce, as in trace, ice, thrice, and this final e must be retained in composition before a, o, u, as in trace-able, peace-able. (3) Ci (rarely ce) preceding another vowel has frequently the sound of (ʃ), esp. in the endings -cious, -cial, -cion, as atrocious, glacial, coercion (ocean). This sound (which is also taken by t in the same position) has been developed in comparatively modern times by palatalization of (s).

In a few words from foreign languages, c retains the foreign pronunciation, as in It. cicerone (tʃitʃe'rone).

The combination CH virtually constitutes a distinct letter, having a history and sound of its own, and as such it receives a separate place in the alphabet of some languages, e.g. Spanish, Welsh. In English it is not so treated, and the ch- words are placed in Dictionaries and alphabetical lists between ce- and ci-. This inclusion of ch in the middle of C is one reason why the latter occupies so large a space in the Dictionary: C is virtually two letters in one, since beside the series ca-, ce-, ci-, cl-, etc., there is the parallel series cha-, che-, chi-, chl-, etc. For the history and sounds of ch, see before the beginning of the ch- words.

b. in Hist. applied spec. to the five ministers of Charles II, who signed the Treaty of Alliance with France for war against Holland in 1672: these were Clifford, Arlington, Buckingham, Ashley (Earl of Shaftesbury), and Lauderdale, the initials of whose names thus arranged chanced to spell the word cabal.

This was merely a witticism referring to sense 6; in point of fact these five men did not constitute the whole 'Cabal', or Committee for Foreign Affairs; nor were they so closely united in policy as to constitute a 'cabal' in sense 5, where quot. 1670 shows that three of them belonged to one 'cabal' or clique, and two to another. The name seems to have been first given to the five ministers in the pamphlet of 1673 'England's Appeal from the private Cabal at White-hall to the Great Council of the nation..by a true lover of his country.' Modern historians often write loosely of the Buckingham-Arlington administration from the fall of Clarendon in 1667 to 1673 as the Cabal Cabinet or Cabal Ministry.

II. In politics.

7. a. As a specific use of 3: The private room in which the confidential advisers of the sovereign or chief ministers of a country meet; the council-chamber. Originally in the literal sense; now taken chiefly for what goes on or is transacted there, i.e. political consultation and action, as 'the field' is taken for 'fighting, warlike action'.

b. The body of persons who meet in such a cabinet; that limited number of the ministers of the sovereign or head of the state who are in a more confidential position and have, in effect, with the head of the state, the determination and administration of affairs.

Formerly called more fully the Cabinet Council, as distinguished from the Privy Cauncil, and as meeting in the cabinet; the later abbreviation is like the use of 'the House', 'the field', for those who fill or frequent it, and would be encouraged by such expressions as 'he is of the cabinet' used of Vane by Roe, 1630. member af the cabinet is later.

Apparently introduced, at the accession of Charles I, in 1625; but the expression cabinet counsel = counsel given privately or secretly in the cabinet or private apartment, occurs earlier and, from the confusion of caunsel and council, was prob. a factor in the name: see Cabinet Caunsellor in 9.

(There are difficulties as to F. câble, older forms of which were caable, chaable, chéable, châble, which point, through cadable*, to a L. catabola* a kind of BALLISTA for hurling stones, etc., in which sense chaable also occurs: see Cabulus in Du Cange. Littré supposes an early confusion between this and cable* from Isidore's capulum; others think that as the catabola was put in motion with ropes, it may be the real source. But this does not account for the Sp. and It. words.]

1. a. A strong thick rope, originally of hemp or other fibre, now also of strands of iron wire.

Originally a stout rope of any thickness, but now, in nautical use, a cable (of hemp, jute, etc.) is 10 inches in circumference and upwards; ropes of less thickness being called cablets or hawsers. In other than nautical use (see 2), rope is commonly used when the material is hemp or fibre (as in the 'rope' by which a train is drawn up an incline), and cable when the material is wire.

cabotage ('kæbətɪdʒ). Naut. [a. F. cabotage (also Sp., in It. cabotaggio) in same sense; f. F. caboter to coast; whence F. has also caboteur, cabotier, cabotin, cabotinage, cabotiner. Derivation uncertain.

Originally a shipping term of the north of France: M. Paul Meyer rejects Littré's guess from Sp. cabo cape, headland, as if 'to sail from cape to cape', as untenable phonetically and historically, and thinks the verb must be from the name of a kind of boat. The gloss 'cobo, trabe, nave' occurs in (MS. Bibl. Nat. 1646 lf. 83 b) a 13th c. copy of an older glossary; and Littré has cabot, chabot as north French equivalents of sabot, which is still applied to a small vessel running two or three knots an hour. (Brachet guesses that caboter may be from the surname Cabot; which may have had the same origin, but cf. prec.)] caco- representing Gr. κακο- combining form of κακός bad, evil, forming many compounds in Greek, some of which, like cacochymy, cacodæmon, cacoethes, cacophony, have reached English through Latin (and French); others have been adapted directly from Greek in modern times (as cacology, cacotrophy); others have been formed on Greek analogies from their elements. Compounds of Greek and Latin, as cacodorous = malodorous, and the medical cacosomnia (sleeping badly) are exceptional. Occasionally caco- is used in looser or casual combination with words of Greek derivation, which may have been modelled on cacodæmon, as in caco-magician, cacotype. It is very freely used in medical terminology to form names of bad states of bodily organs, but most of these are not English in form, e.g. cacoga'lactia (a condition in which the milk is bad), cacoglossia (putrid state of the tongue), cacomorphia (malformation or deformity), caconychia (morbid state of the nails), cacopharyngia (a cade (keɪd), sb.[2] (a.) Also 5 kod, 5–7 cad. [Origin and part of speech unknown. In cade lamb, 'cade' may be an adj. with some such sense as 'cast' or 'domestic, tame', or a sb. used attrib. as in pet-lamb: in the former case 'cade' as a sb. would be short for 'cade-lamb'; in the latter, 'cade-lamb' might be an expansion.

(As Cotgrave gives an alleged F. 'cadel a castling, a starveling, one that hath need much of cockering and pampering', a sense not unlike Eng 'pet', it has been suggested that cade-lamb was perh. for an earlier cadel-lamb*. But this is historically impossible. M. Paul Meyer says Cotgrave's word is not Fr., but app. the 16th c. Languedocien cadel 'little dog', and his explanation erroneous. The corresp. OF. word was chael, cheel, which has no likeness to the ME. kod, cad, even if the sense suited. Wedgwood compares Da. kaad wanton, petulant, sportive:—ON. kát-r merry, cheerful: but cade is not at all Sc., and apparently not properly northern, since Ray 1691 explains the 'North-Country words' pet, pet-lamb as 'a cade-lamb.')] cairn (kɛ̀ən), sb. Also 6–8 carne, 8 cairne, kairn, 8–9 carn. [mod.Sc. form (cf. bairn, wairn, airm, etc.) of earlier carn, a. Gaelic carn masc. 'heap of stones'. Found in Lowland Sc. early in 16th c., and thence recently in Eng., as a term of prehistoric archæology, and more widely and popularly in connexion with the piles of stones used or raised by Ordnance Surveyors. The direct Eng. representative of the Celtic would be carn, which is common on the Ordnance maps of Wales, and in local use with tourists in Wales.

The word is found in all the Celtic langs.; OIrish carn, carnn, carnd occurs as neuter; Welsh, beside carn fem. 'heap', has carn masc. 'hoof' and 'haft of knife', etc., indicating an earlier sense 'horn'. If these are to be identified, the word must be = the recorded Gaulish karn-on neut. 'horn'; in which case the primary sense would apparently be 'cairn on a mountain top' i.e. the 'horn' on its 'head'; which is quite possible, though not certain. The word enters into the names of various mountains in Scotland and Wales. Welsh has also the collective derivative carnedd, as in Carnedd Llewelyn, etc.]

cajole (kə'dʒəʊl), v. Also 7 caiole, cageole, cajoul, 7-8 cajol. [a. F. cajoler, in same sense, of uncertain origin and history.

Paré c 1550 has 'cageoller comme un gay' to chatter like a jay. Littré has 16th c. examples of cajoler, cajoller, cageoller, in the senses 'to chatter like a jay or magpie', and 'to sing', also, in the modern sense 'to cajole'. Cotgr. 1611 has cajoler, cageoler 'to prattle or jangle like a jay (in a cage), to bable or prate much to little purpose'. Most etymologists taking cageoler as the original form, have inferred its derivation from cage cage, through an assumed dim. cageole*. This is doubtful both in regard to sense and form; the early meaning 'to chatter like a jay' does not very obviously arise from cage, and does not clearly give rise to the modern sense. The Fr. dim. of cage is not cageole* but geôle 'gaol', whence F. enjôler (OF. engaioler, engauler, Sp. enjaular) 'to put in gaol, imprison', also 'to inveigle, entice, allure, enthrall by fair words, cajole'. In Namur, cajoler has the sense enjoliver, to make joli, whence Grandgagnage would refer it to the stem jol- of joli, with 'prefix ca- frequent in Walloon with an iterative force'. It is possible that two or even three words are here confused; in the modern sense, F. cajoler is synonymous with enjôler above, and if not cognate with that word, its sense has probably at least been taken over from it by form-association of cageoler or cajoler with enjôler. But the working out of the history must be left to French etymologists.]

calamine ('kæləmaɪn). [a. F. calamine, ad. med.L. calamīna, app. (like the Ger. galmei, formerly kalmei:—calmīa) corrupted by the alchemists from L. cadmīa, Gr. καδμεία, καδμία, 'calamine'.

Agricola supposed the name to be from calamus reed, in allusion to the slender stalactitic forms common in the cadmia fornacum (oxide of zinc from furnace chimneys).]

An ore of zinc: originally applied, like med.L. lapis calaminaris, and the cadmia of Pliny, to both the carbonate $ZnCO_3$, and the hydrous silicate Zn_2SiO_4, H_2O but chiefly, in France and England, to the former, which is an abundant and important English ore of zinc. The silicate, found in Carinthia, Hungary, Belgium, New Jersey, etc., is distinguished as siliceous or electric calamine.

The chemical difference between the two ores was established by Smithson in 1802; in 1807 Brongniart unfortunately chose calamine as the mineralogical name of the silicate, leaving the other ore as zinc carbonatée, which Beudant in 1832 named SMITHSONITE. This nomenclature is followed by Dana. But common English and French use (see Littré) continued to apply the name calamine to the carbonate; and in conformity with this Brooke and Miller in 1852 reversed Beudant's use of calamine and smithsonite. With British mineralogists, chemists, miners, and manufacturers, calamine therefore means the carbonate.

calamity (kəˈlæmɪtɪ). Also 5-6 calamyte, 6-7 calamitie. [a. F. calamité, f. L. calamitāt-em (nom. calamitas), damage, disaster, adversity; by Latin writers associated with calamus straw, corn-stalk, etc., in the sense of damage to crops from hail, mildew, etc. But there is difficulty in reconciling this with the force of the suffix, which etymologically could give only some such sense as 'the quality of being a calamus, reed, or straw' (cf. cīvitas, auctoritas, bonitas); hence some would refer it to a lost calamis* 'injured, damaged', whence incolumis 'uninjured, sound'.
Bacon (Sylva §669) thus fancifully etymologized the word 'Another ill accident is drouth, at the spindling of the corn, which with us is rare, but in hotter countries common; insomuch as the word calamitas was first derived from calamus, when the corn could not get out of the stalke.']

Since calma in OSp. and Pg. means also 'heat of the day', Diez, comparing mod.Pr. chaume 'resting-time of the cattle', and Rumansch calma, cauma 'a shady resting-place for cattle', thought calma possibly derived from late L. cauma (occurring in Vulg., Job xxx. 30), a. Gr. καῦμα 'burning heat, fever heat, heat of the sun, heat of the day', used also in med.L. of the burning heat of the sun. Taken in connexion with the senses of the Rumansch and Provençal words this gives the possible development of meaning 'burning heat, heat of the day, rest during the heat of the day, quiet, stillness'; but it is notable that It. calma has no sense of 'heat', only 'a calme, or quiet faire weather' (Florio). As to the phonetic change of au to al, Diez suggested popular assoc. with calēre to be hot, calor heat, which Schuchardt also (Romania IV. 255) thinks probable; the latter has given other instances of the phonetic change in Vokalismus des Vulgärlateins I. 494-6 and III. 316.]

Chambers (Cycl. 1727–51) s.v. says 'The denomination Calomel rather seems to have first belonged to the Æthiops mineral; from καλος, pulcher, fair; and μελας, niger, black: for that white or pale bodies, rubbed herewith, become black. Some will have it first given to Mercurius dulcis, by a whimsical chymist, who employed a black in his laboratory; whose complexion, as well as that of the mercury, he alluded to in the term: the medicine being fair, the operator black.' Nothing appears as to when, where, or by whom the name was given: Littré calls it 'ancien nom'.]

It. calcatrippa, sense 3; these forms indicate a L. type calcatrap(p)a* or calcitrap(p)a* (the latter is in mod. botanical L.), app. f. calc-em heel + trappa trap, gin, snare (a. OHG. trapo trap, gin, noose); but perhaps in calcatrappa there was an association with calcāre to trample, tread. All the earliest examples are in sense 3; but it seems much more likely that the name should have been first used literally, and then transferred to plants. The mod.Eng. and Fr. sense 'star-thistle' is clearly transferred from 2. As a plant-name the word appeared (from med.L.) already in late OE.; sense 2 was probably adopted from French. Galltrap, frequent in 16–17th c., is an evident popular etymology referring to the galling of horses' feet.]

calve, v.^{2} dial. [Of uncertain standing and derivation. It is possible that (kɑ:v) is merely an earlier pronunciation of cave retained locally; but it is notable that calve in coincides in form and sense with W.Flemish in-kalven (cf. de gracht kalft in 'the ditch caves in' De Bo), in which the root part is the same as in Du. af-kalven, to fall or break away, uit-kalven to fall or shoot out, said of the sides of a cutting or the like. De Vries refers this -kalven to kalve, kaluwe, surface of the ground, surface layer or soil (see CALLOW). In-kalven would thus signify the shooting in of the surface or earth above. Some, however, think that the word is, in its origin, identical with the preceding. The evidence is not decisive.

Calve (kɑ:v, kɔ:v) in, is the vernacular form in Lincolnshire, Notts, Hunts, Norfolk, and adjacent parts of Suffolk, Cambridge, Leicester, Derby, and Yorkshire. Wesley, who is quoted for it, was a native of Epworth, in the district covered by Mr. E. Peacock's Gloss. of Manley and Corringham, North Lincolnshire. Assuming the word to be from Dutch, it has been suggested that it was 'introduced by the Dutch navvies who came over for the large drainage works in the Lincolnshire fens' (Wedgwood).]

CAMBER sb. 2. The lateness of these words is against their being the source of cambrel; on the other hand, the variant forms chambrel (in sense 2) and gambrel (in both senses) make the Welsh derivation difficult. camel ('kæməl), sb. Forms: 1 camel, -ell, 3 kamel, 4–5 camele, kamell(e, 4–7 camell, 5 camelle, -ylle, 6 cammell, 6–7 cammel, 3– camel. Also β. 3 camayl(e, 4–5 camail(e, 5 cameile, cameylle, camayll(e, (camely); γ. 4–5 chamel, 4–7 chamell(e; δ. 4–5 chameyl(e, 5 chamayle, chamoil. [Late OE. camel, camell, ad. L. camēl-us (-ellus), a. Gr. κάμηλ-ος, adopted from Semitic: Heb. and Phœn. gāmāl; if of native Semitic origin, perh. f. vb. gāmal*, Arab. jamala to bear (Gesenius). In ME. affected by the OF. forms (see below).

The early Teutonic name for the camel was app. in some way identical (or rather, perhaps ultimately derived from a common source) with the Gr. ἐλέφας, ἐλέφαντα, L. elephant-us, elephant: viz. Gothic ulbandus (= ulv-), OHG. olbenta, MHG. olbent, OE. olfend, oluend, found in the Ags. Gospels, and coming down as late as Ormin in form OLFEND, q.v. But the Lindisfarne Gloss already in the 10th c. adopted the L. of the Vulgate as camel, camell-, which after the 12th c., helped by the influence of OF., became the only name. So in the other modern Teut. langs.: Ger. kameel, kamel, Du. kameel. The Romanic langs. follow two Latin types: (1) L. camēlus, whence ONF. cameil, OF. chameil, later camoil, chamoil (like vēla, veile, voile); (2) L. camellus, whence It. cammello, Sp. camello, ONF. camel, OF. chamel, mod.F. chameau (like bellus, bello, bel, beau). All the OF. forms appear in ME. (where cameil regularly became camayl); but the camel of OE. and ONF., being also most like the Latin, is the survivor.]

1. a. A precious stone having two layers of different colours, in the upper of which a figure is carved in relief, while the lower serves as a ground. For this purpose the ancients used the onyx, agate, etc., and especially the sardonyx, 'a variety of chalcedony, consisting of alternate parallel layers of white and red chalcedony', which was carved so as to leave a white figure in relief on a red ground. Thence extended to all lapidary's work of the same kind; and in modern times ('by abuse' Littré says) to similar carving in shells of molluscs, of which the inner stratum is differently coloured from the outer.

The ultimate origin is obscure; at the earliest known date the word was associated (by Europeans) with camel, as if stuff made of camel's hair; but there is reason to think it was originally the Arabic khamlat, from khaml; Marco Polo (ed. Yule) I. 248 (Skeat). Khaml, khamlat, is explained by Lane as 'the nap or pile or villous substance on the surface of cloth'; khamlat, by Johnson, as 'camelot, silk and camel's hair, also, all silk or velvet, especially pily and plushy'. According to Littré, the Journal officiel of 1874, p. 3220/1, says camelot is so called from the Arabic seil el kemel, the Angora goat; cf. CAMEL-YARN.]

A name originally applied to some beautiful and costly eastern fabric, afterwards to imitations and substitutes the nature of which has changed many times over. 'A kind of stuff originally made by a mixture of silk and camel's hair; it is now made with wool and silk' (J.). 'A light stuff, formerly much used for female apparel, made of long wool, hard spun, sometimes mixed in the loom with cotton or linen yarn' (Ure). It is uncertain whether it was ever made of camel's hair; but in the 16th and 17th c. it was made of the hair of the Angora goat.

According to Beck, Draper's Dict., 'In [the] production [of camlets], the changes have been rung with all materials in nearly every possible combination; sometimes of wool, sometimes of silk, sometimes of hair, sometimes of hair with wool or silk, at others of silk and wool warp and hair woof..Those of our day have had cotton and linen introduced into their composition. They have been made plain and twilled, of single warp and weft, of double warp, and sometimes with double weft also'.

WGer. or OTeut. kampo-z* was presumably an early Germanic adoption of L. camp-us in its transferred sense 'field of contest or combat', also 'duel, fight, battle, war'; see CAMP sb.[2] The word was thoroughly at home in WGer., and gave origin to numerous derivatives, particularly the vb. kampjon; see KEMP v. and cf. (Kluge and others, however, claim the word as native Teutonic, mainly on the ground of the improbability that the Germans who had so many native words to designate war, should adopt a foreign designation; but they offer no satisfactory account of its etymology.)] camp (kæmp), sb.[2] Also 6–7 campe. [a. F. camp (16th c. in Littré) in same sense: cf. It., Sp., Pg. campo 'camp', orig. 'field', and F. champ, Pr. camp, field, field of tournament, field of battle:—L. camp-us level field, spec. the Campus Martius at Rome, the place for games, athletic practice, military drills, etc., whence 'field of contest or combat', 'field of battle'. Although camp was the Norman form of champ, no trace of it appears in ME., which had only CHAMP from central OF., in the senses of 'field of duel or tournament' and heraldic 'field'. Camp was introduced early in the 16th c., from contemporary Fr. and with the sense castra, but was also at first used to render L. campus in other senses, as well as occasionally in the sense of the earlier champ 'field of combat'.

Littré supposed that the 16th century French use of camp was merely the literary adoption of the Picard form in a special sense; but evidently it was an adaptation of It. (or ? Sp.) campo, in a sense not used with F. champ.]

I. In the military sense.

1. The place where an army or body of troops is lodged in tents or other temporary means of shelter, with or without intrenchments. In common modern use the collection of tents, huts, and other equipments is the chief notion, the site being the 'camping-ground'; but as used of ancient works, Roman, British, Danish, etc., it usually means the intrenched and fortified site, within which an army lodged or defended itself; a modern intrenched camp includes both notions. The name is also given to a permanent station for the reception of troops, in order that they may be trained in manœuvring in large bodies, and in campaigning duties generally, as the camps at Aldershot, Shorncliffe camp, camp of Chalons.

campaign (kæm'peɪn), sb. Also 7–8 campagne, 7 -agn, -aine, -aigne. [a. F. campagne country, open country, champaign, 'the field', campaign, which in the course of the 16th c. took the place of the earlier champagne in all its senses (except as the proper name of a French province). It was introduced into Eng. in the 17th c., and at first occasionally used in all the senses of the earlier CHAMPAIGN, but was at length differentiated, and restricted to the military sense, for which it is now the proper term. The forms campagna, -agnia, -ania were also in 17th c. use (see above).

Littré treats 16th c. Fr. campagne as a substitution of the northern or Picard dialect form for the Parisian champagne; but there can be no doubt that it was actually an adaptation of It. campagna (common in the military sense in 16th c., e.g. Caro Virgil's Æn. XII. 563 'Turno la campagna aprendo', Turnus opening the campaign), and may have been taken into F. first in military phraseology, and gradually extended to other senses, the advantage of a form which could not be confounded with the name of the province Champagne perhaps conducing to the result. For ultimate etymology see CHAMPAIGN, CAMPANIA.]

3. Mil. The continuance and operations of an army 'in the field' for a season or other definite portion of time, or while engaged in one continuous series of military operations constituting the whole, or a distinct part, of a war. (In Ger. Feldzug.)

The name arose in the earlier conditions of warfare, according to which an army remained in quarters (in towns, garrisons, fortresses, or camps) during the winter, and on the approach of summer issued forth into the open country (nella campagna, dans la campagne) or 'took the field', until the close of the season again suspended active operations. Hence the name properly signifying the 'being in the field', was also applied, now to the season or time during which the army kept the field, and now to the series of operations performed during this time. In the changed conditions of modern warfare, the season of the year is of much less importance, and a campaign has now no direct reference to time or season, but to an expedition or continuous series of operations bearing upon a distinct object, the accomplishment or abandonment of which marks its end, whether in the course of a week or two, or after one or more years. The history of the sense is seen in early Dictionaries; e.g.

1656 Blount Glossogr. s.v., A word much used among Souldiers, by whom the next Campaine is usually taken for the next Summers Expedition of an Army, or its taking the field. 1721 Bailey, Campain, [in Military Affairs] the space of time every Year, an Army continues in the Field, during a War. 1730–6 —— A summer's war. 1755 Johnson, Campaign, the time for which any army keeps the field, without entering into quarters.

campion² ('kæmpɪən). Herb. Also 7 campian, 7-8 champion. [This name appears first in Lobel (1576) and Lyte (1578) applied to the 'Rose Campion' or 'Garden Campions' (Lychnis, now Agrostemma, coronaria), and the 'Wild Campions'—Red and White—(L. diurna, and vespertina). As the first was identical with the plant called by Dioscorides λυχνὶς στεφανωματικὴ, in Lat. lychnis corōnāria, where the second word in both means 'of or fit for a crown, chaplet, or wreath', and the λυχνὶς is said by Theophrastus to have been used for garlands, the Eng. name has been conjectured to be identical with CAMPION¹ and = 'champion'.

But if so, we should have looked for some such name as 'Campions' flower' 'Campions' lychnis', and also that the name should have gone back to the 14th c. when the form 'campion' for 'champion' was in Eng. use. But of neither do we find any trace, and the conjecture must for the present be taken for what it is worth. The Dict. des Sciences du Nat. (1818) tome X, has 'Compagnon Blanc, nom vulgaire Lychnis dioica.' HÉRICHER, Philol. de la Flore de Normandie et d'Angleterre 18, has Red and White Campion, le rouge et le blanc Compagnon, but the age of these names and their relation to campion is very doubtful. Others have conjectured formation from campus field.]

Later writers have extended it, with qualifications, to a number of allied species, as campion of Constantinople, the Scarlet Lychnis (L. chalcedonica); meadow campion, the Ragged Robin, *L. can (kæn), v.[1] irreg. (Forms: see below.) [A defective verb, belonging to the small but interesting group of Teutonic preterite-present verbs (now chiefly used as auxiliaries of tense, mood, or predication), in form characterized by having as their present tense an original preterite, which retains the preterite form but has come to have a present signification, and from which a new weak past tense has subsequently been developed. Cf. dare, etc. OE. cunnan, pres. Ind. can (cǫn), pa. cúðe (:—cunðe), is identical with OFris. kunna, kan, kunda (konda), OS. cunnan, can, consta, const, (Du. kunnen, kan, konde), OHG. kunnan, kan, kunda (konda), or kunsta (konsta), (Ger. können, kann, konnte), ON. kunna, kann, kunna (:—kunða), Goth. (and OTeut.) kunnan, kann, kunþa. The OTeut. sense was 'to know, know how, be mentally or intellectually able', whence 'to be able generally, be physically able, have the power, L. posse'. Since the present was formally a preterite, its meaning 'I know' must have been derived from that of 'I have learned, I have attained to knowledge'; the original present stem being kin-n-* or ken-n-, pre-Teut. gen-n-: cf. Lith. zinaú I know, Zend ā-zaiñ-ti knowledge, OIr. pret. adgéin he knew. Beside this Teutonic has knâ- (ablaut form knô-), WGer. knā-, whence OE. cnáwan to KNOW, OHG. ir-chnâ-an, bi-chnâ-an, to recognize, ûr-chnâ-t recognition (answering to a Goth. -knêþs* fem.). This stem is widely diffused in the Aryan langs.; cf. L., Gr. gnô- in L. gnô-sco, Gr. γι-γνώ-σκω (ἔ-γνω-ν); OSlav. zna-ti to know; OIr. gnáth known. In Skr. the pres. has stem jan-, the preterite jñā, jānā'mi, jajña'u.

It has been further thought that the root was originally related to the Aryan gen- (with by-forms gnā-, gnō-), to bring forth, produce, Skr. ja'nāmi, pret. jajā'na, L., Gr. gen-, gi-gn- (see KIN, KING); but if so, they were already differentiated in Old Aryan, and the nature of the connexion of sense has not been determined.]

Here, as in BE, it will be convenient to illustrate the inflexions separately from the senses.

A. Inflexions.

The current spelling is erroneous: l began to be inserted about 1525, app. in mechanical imitation of should and would, where an etymological l had become silent, so that these words now rimed with coud, and might better have been written shoud, woud; cf. northern wad. †10. to can or con thank(s): to express or offer thanks, to thank: app. originally 'to acknowledge' or 'recognize' one's gratitude. [ME. thank cunne(n, OE. þonc cunnan, = þonc witan, in OS. thank witan, OHG. thank wizan. Cf. also Gr. χάριν εἰδέναι, (L. gratias meminisse), It. saper grado, Pr. saver grat, F. savoir gré, whence also in ME. to cunne gree, maulgre, to express one's satisfaction or displeasure. These phrases were distinctly identified with can, could as late as 1525. But on the other hand, already in ME., the verb was often imagined to be different, and inflected as a weak vb. can or cunn (whence cannes, canned; cunnest, cunnes, cunneth, cunned) and in later times generally con (connest, cons, conned), rarely ken. See CON: the examples which follow illustrate its original form as belonging to can.]

† can, v.[2] (pa. tense.) Obs. Also 4 cun, cunne, 4–5 kan, con, conne. [In ME. and early mod.Eng. used for GAN, pa. t. of ginnan to begin: see GIN v. In the early MSS. of Cursor Mundi gan and can constantly interchange, but the evidence shows that can was fully established in northern use early in the 14th c., and its beginnings were evidently in the period before 1300, from which no northern documents survive. It was in its origin a variant of gan, apparently merely phonetic; in later times, when used as a simple auxiliary of tense, its identity with gan tended to be forgotten; it was, from its form and construction, curiously associated with the preceding verb CAN, and this occasionally led to a forgetfulness of its being a past tense, and to the substitution of couth, coud, could, the pa. t. of that verb. Can prevailed in northern and north midland poets till the 16th c., and in the end of that century it was greatly affected by Spenser and his fellow-archaists and followers. Its main function is now filled by did, though the original gan is still a favourite note of ballad poetry.]

1. A verb in the past tense meaning gan, i.e. began, fell, set, proceeded to. Followed by an infinitive with to, it was much less usual than gan.

‖canard (kanar, kə'nɑːd), sb. [Fr.; lit. 'duck'; also used in sense 1: see note there.]

1. An extravagant or absurd story circulated to impose on people's credulity; a hoax, a false report.

Littré says Canard for a silly story comes from the old expression 'vendre un canard à moitié' (to half-sell a duck), in which à moitié was subsequently suppressed. It is clear that to half-sell a duck is not to sell it at all; hence the sense 'to take in, make a fool of'. In proof of this he cites bailleur de canards, deliverer of ducks, utterer of canards, of date 1612: Cotgr., 1611, has the fuller vendeur de canards a moitié 'a cousener, guller, cogger; foister, lyer'. Others have referred the word to an absurd fabricated story purporting to illustrate the voracity of ducks, said to have gone the round of the newspapers, and to have been credited by many. As this account has been widely circulated, it is possible that it has contributed to render the word more familiar, and thus more used, in English.

[I saw the word in print before 1850 (J.A.H.M.).]

1864 in WEBSTER. 1866 Even. Standard 13 July 6 A silly canard circulated by the Owl, about England having joined France and Russia in 'offering' their mediation to the belligerents. 1880 W. cannel ('kænəl), sb.[2] Forms: 6 canel, (7–8 canole, 7 cannol), 7 cannell, cannal, 8 canal, cannil, kennel, (7–8 channel, 8–9 candle), 7– cannel. [Of northern, prob. Lancashire origin. Can'le, cannle is the Sc. and northern form of candle, and the opinion has been expressed, at least since early in the 18th c., that cannel-coal is really = 'candle-coal'. It does not appear in evidence that the pronunciation of candle as can'le goes back in Lancashire to the 16th c., though such may be the case. A greater difficulty is that it is doubtful whether the original name was not simply canel, rather than cannel coal: see the first mention in Leland 1538. But no other etymological conjecture yet offered will bear examination. The following quotations refer to the derivation:

a 1734 North Lives I. 294 Famous for yielding the Canal (or Candle) coal. It is so termed, as I guess, because the manufacturers in that country use no candle, but work by the light of their coal fire. 1796 Kirwan Min. II. 52 Cannel Coal. This is found chiefly in Lancashire, its proper name is Candle Coal, as it burns like a Candle, but Candles in that shire are called Cannels. 1811 Pinkerton Petral. I. 572 Cannel coal, so called from the enunciation of the word candle, in Scotland and the north of England, because its flame is clear and pure, like that of a candle. 1836 Sir G. Head Home Tour 14 It seems to be the general opinion that having been used to light the men at their work, and serving as candle, it became by corruption 'Cannel' coal. 1875 Robinson Whitby Gloss. (E.D.S.) Cannle, a candle. Cannle-coal or kennel-coal, so called because it burns without smoke like a candle.]

A bituminous coal (in Scotland called parrot-coal), which burns with a very bright flame, and, from its richness in volatile matter, is much used in the manufacture of coal oils and gas: its texture is sufficiently compact and hard to allow of its being cut and polished like jet.
